"Gen.Radescu continues to sponsor his program, that is the enlargement of the Committee so as to get rid of the "hostile" majority. He will try to obtain a decision of the King for the appointment of additional members. If he does not succeed in that way,he will use another : the upsetting of the former majority and then a decision taken by the new majority to augment the number of members. His calculations are based on the hope that Crihan will fill the vacancy created by Buzesti's death.

I don't know Crihan but I am told that he hides a treacherous spirit under an external aspect of kindness,simplicity and good nature. He now declares that he is a warm friend of Radescu, which he has known for a long time and of whose good faith he is thorough- ly convinced.

Radescu says that once the majority has been changed and once the Committee shall have been augmented,a thorough reorganization will take place : Cretzianu will have to give up all what makes now his force. A new Secretary General will be appointed and the funds adminstered up to now by Cretzianu will be taken over by the Committee. Radescu points out that these sums, added to the funds of the Lisbon Legation (Totescu) and to the monthly subsidies from the National Committee for Free Europe, will allow a distribu- tion of money to many exiles.

General Petrescu has also declared himself for Radescu and against the would-be dictators, Cretzianu and Visoianu. He is also candidate for a seat in the Committee.

Radescu's action pursues the isolation of Popa and Veniamin, which are accused of being under the influence of Visoianu and Cretzianu, and the formation of a new "independent" leadership in the National-Peasant Party in exile. In Paris, Radescu wants to give the task of representing the Committe to a triumvirate of which two of the members would be Herescu and Bunescu. "
